

Bio:

Growing up in Singapore, Jane Lee and her brother used to joke that the only two fun activities on the island were eating and watching movies. Much to their parents' bewilderment, the two took the joke far too literally when Jane's brother went on to become a chef and Jane moved to Los Angeles to pursue a career in Hollywood. In 2016, she earned her BA in Film and Television Production at USC. After graduating, she got her start at EuropaCorp Films before joining Jon M. Chu at his production company, Electric Somewhere. Since witnessing first hand the cultural effects of films like "Crazy Rich Asians" and "In The Heights", Jane is now perpetually focused on amplifying new perspectives, championing stories that have not yet been told, and creating meaningful spectacle.

Three Career Highlights

- Spearheading the company's internship program with USC's School of Cinematic Arts. With over half of our company being SCA alum, I wanted to continue cultivating our relationship with the school and tracking these young and talented creatives to bring into the fold.
- Supporting Jon M. Chu through the entire process of making "In the Heights".
- In a competitive situation, I was able to have our company enter into an attachment agreement with a rising writer on an exciting new film project.
